

Is Juvenile Justice the Right Place to Manage Drug Treatment for Teens?

December 6, 2007

Jeffrey A. Butts is a research fellow with Chapin Hall Center for Children at the University of Chicago, where he also teaches in the School of Social Service Administration. His research has investigated the effectiveness of teen courts and juvenile drug courts, the methods state agencies use to anticipate changing juvenile corrections populations, and new strategies for measuring disproportionate minority contact in juvenile justice. Before moving to Chicago in 2005, he was director of the Program on Youth Justice at the Urban Institute.

Heike Gramckow is deputy director of NCSC International and specializes in governance, management, and organizational reform of the justice sector, including police, prosecution, courts, and ministries of justice. Her country assessments, legislative reviews, and studies have looked at judicial independence, the role of prosecutors, victim's issues, drug crimes, juvenile justice, and community-oriented justice. Before NCSC, she served as director for management and research at the American Prosecutors Research Institute and worked with CSR, Inc., where her main client was the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Emmitt Hayes Jr. is director of probation services at the Travis County (Texas) Juvenile Probation Department, where he is responsible for juvenile offender supervision and specialized programs operations. He implemented the Travis County Juvenile Justice Integrated Network, which was recently honored with the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration's 2007 Science and Service Award. A consultant to federal, state, and local agencies, universities, and community organizations, he has developed, implemented, and managed human service programs for 27 years.

John Roman is a senior research associate in the Urban Institute's Justice Policy Center. He is directing a cost-effectiveness study of the use of DNA in burglary investigations, a study of the demand for community-based interventions with drug-involved arrestees, and a cost-benefit analysis of Maryland's death penalty. Roman also manages a national evaluation of adult drug courts and cost-benefit analyses of the national serious, violent offender reentry initiative. He was coeditor with Jeffrey Butts of Juvenile Drug Courts and Teen Substance Abuse.

Neely Tucker is a staff writer in the Style section of the Washington Post and a former criminal courts reporter. His first journalism job was the Yalobusha County (Mississippi) correspondent for the Oxford Eagle. He has since reported from more than a dozen states and 50 countries or territories. As a foreign correspondent (1993-2000), he crossed the foothills of the Alps with Romanian clandestines and covered the war in Bosnia, post-genocide Rwanda, and conflicts from Iraq and southern Lebanon to Congo and Sierra Leone. He explored race, war, family, and heartbreak in Love in the Driest Season, named one of 2004's best books by Publishers Weekly.