

WHO WILL HIRE ME WHEN I'M 64?
CHALLENGES TO INCREASING EMPLOYMENT OF OLDER WORKERS

December 4, 2007

Barbara D. Bovbjerg is director for Education, Workforce, and Income Security Issues at the U.S. Government Accountability Office. She oversees evaluative studies on aging and retirement income policy, including Social Security and private pension programs, and operations and management at the Social Security Administration, Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, and Employee Benefit Security Administration. Previously, she led the citywide analysis unit of the District of Columbia's Budget Office and analyzed state and local government finance issues for the Urban Institute.

Katherine Reynolds Lewis (moderator) is a national correspondent for Newhouse News Service who writes about career, personal finance, and other business topics. Before joining Newhouse as the money and work reporter in 2003, she worked for Bloomberg News in Washington, covering everything from media and technology policy to commodities and financial market regulation. She began her journalism career in New York City with the Bond Buyer, a municipal bond industry publication.

Sharon Perley Masling is senior legislative counsel for Workplace Flexibility 2010, located at Georgetown University Law Center, and oversees the organization's National Advisory Commission and Legal Working Group. Prior to this position, she was director of legal services for the National Disability Rights Network, counsel for disability policy for Sen. Tom Harkin, a teaching fellow at Georgetown Law Center's Federal Legislation Clinic, and a trial attorney in the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division.

Cynthia A. Metzler is president and CEO of Experience Works, a nonprofit organization focused on helping low-income older people get the training they need to find jobs in their community. Her government service includes posts as special assistant and chief counsel to the chairman of the Federal Labor Relations Board, associate director of presidential personnel at the White House, associate administrator of the General Services Administration, assistant secretary of labor, and acting secretary of labor under President Clinton. She has also been executive director of Florida Rural Legal Services and provost at Cedar Crest College.

Eric Toder is a senior fellow at the Urban Institute and Urban-Brookings Tax Policy Center, where he specializes in retirement policy and tax policy issues. From 2001 to 2004, he directed the Office of Research at the Internal Revenue Service. His previous posts include deputy assistant secretary for tax analysis at the U.S. Treasury Department, deputy assistant director for tax analysis at the Congressional Budget Office, and consultant to the New Zealand Treasury.