

Thursday's Child

The Real Costs of Teen Motherhood Thursday, October 23

Sarah S. Brown is the CEO of The National Campaign to Prevent Teen and Unplanned Pregnancy, an initiative that focuses on preventing unplanned pregnancy among young adults. Before cofounding the National Campaign, she was a senior director at the Institute of Medicine, where she led studies on issues of maternal, child, and reproductive health. She speaks frequently on issues of teen sex and unplanned pregnancy, and regularly appears in the television, radio, and print media.

Robert M. Goerge is a Chapin Hall research fellow who focuses on improving the available information on children and families, particularly those who require specialized services related to maltreatment, disability, poverty, or mental illness. Dr. Goerge developed Chapin Hall's pioneering Integrated Database on Children's Services in Illinois, which links the administrative records of more than 4 million children and their families involved with approximately 30 service agencies to provide a comprehensive picture of how they use publicly provided or financed service programs.

Saul D. Hoffman is professor of economics and department chair at the University of Delaware. He has published extensively on the relationship between economic forces and demographic behavior, including research on the economic consequences of divorce and of teen and non-marital childbearing, and on the impact of the welfare system on family structure. He is the coeditor of Kids Having Kids: Economic Costs and Social Consequences of Teen Pregnancy (Second Edition), published by the Urban Institute in 2008.

Pat W. Mosena is president of Options for Youth, an organization devoted to the development of community-based programs that maximize the potential of inner-city youth. She directs two programs that work to delay second pregnancies among adolescent mothers: Illinois Subsequent Pregnancy Project (SPP) and Options. Dr. Mosena is also director of Peer Advocates for Health, a program that provides reproductive health training and employment to adolescent African American males living on the South Side of Chicago.

Matthew W. Stagner is executive director of Chapin Hall and a senior lecturer at the Irving B. Harris School of Public Policy Studies at the University of Chicago. Before returning to Chapin Hall, where he began his career, Dr. Stagner directed the Center on Labor, Human Services, and Population at the Urban Institute in Washington, D.C. He also served as division director at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Division of Children and Youth Policy. Dr. Stagner is an expert on youth risk behaviors, child welfare services, and program evaluation. He is chair of the National Campaign's Research Advisory Panel.